resisted pressure to join the United States in launching air strikes against the militant group headed by Osama bin Laden after the militant headed David Haines, a British aid worker, was taken hostage, and threatened to kill him.

After chairing a ceremony in London, Prime Minister David Cameron said his government was battling IS on numerous fronts but made clear it was not launching air strikes. "As our strategy intensifies, we must take whatever steps necessary to deal with this threat to keep our country safe," he said, describing an approach that included diplomatic pressure, urging US action and helping local Kurdish forces.

"By step, we must drive the ISIL (IS) and what it does. We will do so in a calm, steady way, but with an iron fist," he said in a TV address from his offices. "I was quick to join US action in Afghanistan
