grow and shave the sheep twice a year and sell the wool to the 'company' (KHAMIR). We get about 500 gm of wool from one sheep in one shaving. We get wool once a year. The company buys the wool from us at the rate of ₹5 per kg. Earlier it was difficult to make both ends meet, but now we are able to earn enough to meet the expenses and not enough to save," says Jawar Bhai, who owns 200 sheep.

His wife, Karmi ben, helps him and also does embroidery and mirror work.

"For now I am doing it only for use by family members but I am hopeful that after experience and exposure, and if there are buyers, she may even think in terms of earning some products from desi sheep on KHAMIR, earning ₹20,000 to ₹25,000 a month.

There are an estimated seven crore sheep in India, which is the sheep wool. Today about a hundred women get wages by doing this work.

But it is more challenging to market products made from from herder to spinner, dyer and weaver so that all of them are able to earn some money."

Mangaliya also talked about little-known properties of the people were trained and helped to set up shop of different types of agro chemicals and other products for the ease of farmers. In addition, farmers were made to attend 'krishis' (agri fairs), workshops and seminars to clarify their doubts on agriculture technologies and their usage.

Reducing input cost

A major reason for farmers' increased input cost is the expensive sprays they need to use because of their inability to correctly identify the stage at which the spray is recommended. This problem, which not only increased costs but also amounted to excessive use of agrochemicals, was addressed. Following the training programme, on an average, the number of sprays reduced to 10 per cent for crops like cotton and brinjal. For the other varieties, this significant reduction in cost was achieved by implementing efficient farming methods. Experts helped farmers adopt multiple methods for pest control, such as devices that could trap insects instead of killing them, creating stands for birds, and implanting and releasing the number of beneficial insects such as spiders, which are beneficial for paddy crops. The results have been encouraging, so plans are in place to replicate the programme and take up new crops as well.
