Push for Self-reliance Gains Momentum

The balance between being ambitious and being competitive will be a critical factor in determining our success towards becoming a self-reliant nation

Since Independence, we have been apprehensive about the expertise of our people, our resources, our home-grown industries or even our brilliant entrepreneurs. In short, we didn't trust ourselves. In the early years since Independence, we entrusted public sector units to oversee many of our development works in various fields, but when that failed, we took to globalisation in 1991. Globalisation opened us to foreign direct investments (FDI), MNCs and foreigners, in turn leading to a capital-based growth system which was jobless, faceless and ruthless. Thereafter, we allowed the imports of subsidised Chinese goods thereby inviting job losses and economic inequalities within our country. This put several industries out of business as the Chinese imports reduced the demand for indigenous products. This made people subsist on government doles rather than being valuable contributors to the country.

to have access to globally competitive resources coupled with globally competitive synergies, only then the resolution of 'Vocal for Local' will truly succeed in its true essence. The global market today is an intricate web of tightly interdependent value chains, wherein market competitiveness is determined by the two holy grails of price and quality. What will be worth seeing in coming years is whether this 'idea' will be applicable to all the sectors or only a select few, depending upon the availability of resources and expertise in the country. 'Vocal for Local' strategy should be aimed towards protecting industries without leading to 'protectionism'.

can we attract investment from domestic and foreign players. Thus, the key consideration for a self-reliant India should be to build and create businesses that are competitive and able to forge a strong value chain via brand, package, price and channels.

Though the idea and ambition to make India a promising manufacturing centre compared with China is worth the appreciation, Indian industries won't be in a condition to provide any benefit unless price competitiveness can be created and sustained - only then

If implemented correctly, 'Vocal for Local' strategy will not just create job opportunities but will also generate a lot of confidence among our local industries.

Our long dependence on imports, even for basic necessities, has cast a shadow on our commitment towards local industries. Why to import at all when we can produce and manufacture on our own? Don't we trust our capabilities and expertise? Don't we have the resources to make at least the necessary products on our own? The lesser the imports, the lesser is our dependence on a country like China, which cannot be trusted anymore. Think of the possibilities that this attitude towards going 'swadeshi' might open for us - not just increased job opportunities but our assertion on being self-reliant will also generate a lot of confidence among our local industries.

The world is currently faced with the existential threat from COVID-19 as economies continue tumbling down. In such a scenario, it is very essential to spread awareness regarding the benefits of going 'swadeshi' or self-reliance. Seeing the plight of our industries and emerging business opportunities due to COVID-19, the Indian Prime Minister announced recently to go 'Vocal for Local', signalling a strong push for self-reliance to revive those local industries that were taken for granted. On May 12, announcing the Rs 20 lakh crore AtmaNirbhar package in an address to the nation, Prime Minister Modi had said, "Friends, the Corona crisis has also explained to us the importance of local manufacturing, local market and local supply chain. In times of crisis, this local has fulfilled our demand, this local has saved us. Local is not just need, it is our responsibility also."

The government firmly believes that the time has come to usher in a new era of development with a new thought process. The new thought process stems from the prevailing situations in the country. The prevalent situations in the country, especially the Chinese incursions on LAC and Galwan Valley and COVID-19, have certainly fuelled the aspirations of Indians and Indian Inc. to go 'Vocal for Local' thus trusting our local facilities, workmen, resources and expertise. Amid the recent face off with China, the Confederation of All India Traders (CAIT) Secretary General Praveen Khandelwal called for a boycott of the Chinese goods, "By calling for the boycott of these Chinese products, the objective is to reduce import of Chinese Finished goods by $13 billion or about Rs one lakh crore, by December 2021."

However, what's important to remember is not to repeat the mistakes of former Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi while implementing the 'Make-in-India' initiative. The balance between being ambitious and being competitive, compared with other world exporters, will be critical in determining our success towards being self-reliant and becoming a leading exporter.

While the 'Vocal for Local' is a brilliant idea, we have to realise that over the past 70 years, the world has changed radically. To create a globally competitive product, we need
