Royal Enfield to recall 15,200 units of 3 models sold abroad

ICONIC BIKE MAKER Royal Enfield has decided to recall 15,200 units of its 650 and 500-class models sold abroad due to a common related issue.

The company, which has been selling a brake caliper issue as a recall to owners in India, has expanded the recall to include products sold in 30 countries. The recall follows the recent announcement by the company regarding the recall of 5,000 units in India due to the same issue. The expanded recall reportedly affects units sold in the United States, Europe, and other countries.

Royal Enfield shall contact the owners affected by the recall through a Notice and Corrective Action Notice, which the customers can then use to arrange for the recall. The company has said it would take care of all the costs related to the recall and will also provide assistance to customers in travelling to India if necessary.

The recall is intended to address the brake caliper issue as per US safety standards, which has led to the recall of 15,200 units of 650 and 500-class motorcycles sold abroad. The recall is part of the company’s global recall program to ensure the safe operation of its motorcycles.

Royal Enfield has committed to ensuring the safety and reliability of its products and has taken appropriate action to address the issue. It has said that customers affected by the recall can contact the nearest Royal Enfield dealer or the customer service team for assistance in scheduling the recall.

The company has reiterated its commitment to customers and is working towards swift and effective resolution of the issue. The recall is expected to be completed within a few weeks, and Royal Enfield has encouraged customers to take necessary action to ensure the safety of their motorcycles.
