Cotton spinners’ revenue likely to hit six-year-low

TEPDOMESTIC and export demand following the coronavirus pandemic has been pushing cotton spinners to their limits, and their revenue is likely to hit a six-year low due to low demand.

Cotton spinners are facing a double whammy as domestic and international demand for cotton is expected to fall this year due to lower revenue.

The domestic industry, which had faced a loss of 10,000 to 15,000 rupees per ton in the past, has now seen a decrease of 20,000 to 30,000 rupees per ton.

The leading buyers in the country include international buyers, who have reduced their imports to meet domestic demand.

Many spinners have already started reducing their workforce to cut costs, and the situation is expected to worsen in the coming months.

Domestic demand for cotton has also been affected by a decrease in production, which has led to a decrease in demand for raw cotton. However, international demand for cotton has been affected by a decrease in production due to decreased exports from India.

The leading buyers in the country include international buyers, who have reduced their imports to meet domestic demand. Many spinners have already started reducing their workforce to cut costs, and the situation is expected to worsen in the coming months.
