Trump lifts sanctions on Turkey after it declares peacekeeping force in Syria

President Donald Trump lifted sanctions on Turkey after it declared a peacekeeping force in Syria, ending a standoff that had pushed the two NATO allies to the brink of war.

The move came as the U.S. military began withdrawing its own troops from Syria, in a sudden reversal of Trump's earlier policy.

Trump had previously threatened to impose sanctions on Turkey for its incursion into Syria, a key ally in the fight against the Islamic State. The sanctions were part of a broader strategy to isolate Turkey, which had been accused of supporting terrorism.

However, Trump changed his mind after Turkey agreed to establish a safe zone in Syria, which would be controlled by U.S.-backed Kurdish forces.

Turkey's President Recep Tayyip Erdogan had been under pressure from Trump to stop the incursion, which had sparked a diplomatic crisis between the two nations.

The move was seen as a major victory for Erdogan, who has been embroiled in a series of domestic and diplomatic scandals in recent months.

Trump's decision was also welcomed by many in Congress, who had been critical of his previous foreign policy decisions.

However, the lifting of sanctions is likely to be met with criticism from other countries, particularly those in the Middle East and Europe, who have been critical of Trump's policies.

The move also raises questions about the future of the U.S.-Turkey relationship, which has been strained in recent years over a range of issues.

Despite the lifting of sanctions, Trump has said that the U.S. military will continue its withdrawal from Syria, a decision that has been met with both praise and criticism.

The move is also likely to have implications for the fight against the Islamic State, which still controls parts of Syria and Iraq.

Thelifting of sanctions on Turkey is seen as a sign of the growing US-Turkey rapprochement, which has been strained in recent years over a range of issues, including the incursion into Syria.
