China forced into world’s largest work-from-home experiment

BLOOMBERG
February 3

THANKS TO THE coronavirus outbreak, working from home is no longer a privilege, it’s a necessity.

While factories, shops, hotels and restaurants are warning about plunging foot traffic that is transforming city centers into ghost towns, behind the closed doors of apartments and suburban homes, thousands of businesses are trying to figure out how to stay operational in a virtual world.

“It’s a good opportunity for us to test working from home at scale,” said Alvin Foo, managing director of Reprise Digital, a Shanghai ad agency with 400 people that’s part of Interpublic Group. “Obviously, not easy for a creative ad agency that brainstorm a lot in person.” It’s going to mean a lot of video chats and phone calls, he said.

The cohorts working from home are about to grow into armies. At the moment, most people in China are still on vacation for the Lunar New Year. But as Chinese companies begin to restart operations, it’s likely to usher in the world’s largest work-from-home experiment.

That means a lot more people trying to organize client meetings and group discussions via videochat apps, or discussing plans on productivity software platforms like WeChat Work or Bytedance’s Slack-like Lark.

The vanguards for the new model of scattered employees are the Chinese financial centers of Hong Kong and Shanghai, cities with central business districts that rely on hundreds of thousands of office workers in finance, logistics, insurance, law and other white-collar jobs.

Clearing expenses

One Hong Kong banker said he’s going to extend an overseas vacation, as he can work from anywhere with a laptop and a phone. Others say they are using the time typically spent winning and dining clients to clear their backlog of travel expenses. One said he’s shifted focus to deals in Southeast Asia.

No one is taking meetings, my schedule is pretty empty, said Jeffrey Broer, a venture advisor in Hong Kong. One person emailed me: Shall we meet somewhere in February?

One of the most unsettling factors for employees is the fast-changing impact of the virus, which is prompting daily changes in corporate directives.

Tiko Mannuhashi, a senior event planner at the Hyatt hotel in Beijing who was supposed to return to work on Friday, was initially told her vacation would be extended until February 5. Then she received a notification to work from home for two additional days. A few days later, the deadline was extended until Feb. 10. She has to notify her department each morning about her whereabouts and report whether she is running a temperature.

“Usually going back to work from holidays feels a little weird, but working from home this time with such short notice feels even more unusual,” she said. With hotel event cancellations rolling in on a daily basis, “basically, all I can do is answer emails,” she said.

Some managers worry the office exodus will lower productivity, but there’s evidence the opposite may be true. A 2015 study from Stanford University in California found that productivity among call-center employees at Chinese travel agency Ctrip went up by 13% when they worked from home due to fewer breaks and more comfortable work environments.
