Proposed seeds law must balance interests of farmers, breeders

The crucial role of quality seeds in doubling farm incomes can hardly be overstated. The Seeds Bill, 2004, had sought to modify a 38-year-old law, and incentivise private participation in the seed industry at a time when the returns of the Green Revolution began to slowly diminish in the 1980s. Even as some of the provisions were contested by a Food Commission appointed by the Ministry of Agriculture, its recommendations were accepted by the Centre, the moves were not enated into law. Today, it is surprising that the 2004 draft has been revived and put in the public domain for comments, disregarding some of the recommendations of the House panel. The revised draft has been criticised on three grounds: the paltry compensation, which cannot act as a deterrent for the sale of non-performing seeds; not providing for a redressal mechanism within the seeds law and instead forcing farmers to move the Consumer Protection Act (COPRA); and finally, not providing any form of price regulation. To take the last point first, prices are best left to market forces and a regulatory regime that encourages the availability of quality seeds will sort out this issue. However, the panel is right in arguing that farmers would find it harder to seek recourse under COPRA. The suggestion that compensation panels be set up within this law to deal with the issue has unfortunately been disregarded.

Penalties for malpractices should be stiff, and fines levied on companies regarding quality issues can be serious. In fact, this can be brought under crop insurance.
